

I strongly believe this rule should not prevent States from imposing stricter rules on telephone solicitation than you are considering. For example, Indiana's law allows businesses ample freedom with respect to existing customers but imposes serious penalties for "cold" calls. Indiana's law has all but eliminated unwanted calls in my household reducing interruptions from 3-5 per night to 2-3 per month, a welcome relief. To help consumers, you must help consumers! Do not allow a multitude of loopholes for businesses. My home is for relaxation; I do not want it invaded by sellers hawking their wares. When States choose to tighten controls in this area, an agency of the Federal Government should not stand in their way.
